

I am writing to ask that the FCC not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

Recently, I moved and had to change my telephone number. The old number was on the privacy list and I had not received any soliciting calls for many months. After I moved, I have received an average of 2 or 3 soliciting calls a week, sometimes 2 or 3 in one evening, because my new number is not on the list. And I have been at this number for only a month. At least one company, an Indianapolis paper, has called twice. I will not give money or buy anything as a result of an unsolicited telephone call, so these calls are a real nuisance, especially when the caller will not hang up.

I consider Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections very effective and do not want them lessened.

Thank you.
